- May 18 Girls in STEM Inspiration Day
- Parent concern over their student’s suspension

► Presentation on the Process to Determine Special Education Services
Special Education staff Jodi Payne and Kristi Robison presented on the Patterns of Strengths and Weaknesses (PSW) Model for use in identifying students for special education. PUSD has been using the discrepancy model for many years. The discrepancy model has no theoretical basis and many researchers have noted it has led to an over identification of students, is not developmentally sensitive, and is not used consistently among practitioners. PSW is based on cognitive neuroscience that has shown the links between students’ cognitive processing skills and academic achievement. Some of the many benefits of the PSW model include that it addresses the “wait to fail” concern, it requires an answer to why the student is not responding, and the assessment results can be better linked to targeted interventions and strategies.
